TWO FEDERAL FOREST RESERVES Speaker Cannon's Power to Block the Will of the Paople.

But the most strenuous of all the resolutions passed at the meeting of the American forestry association was that concerning the proposed Appala-chian and White mountain reserves. In the West more than a number million acres, of reserves have thus far been secured. The East has no similar reserves, yet there are no less needed to the preservation of timber and the prevention of drought. The White mountain forcat range regulates the flow of the five principal New England rivers; the lower Appalachian range regulates the flow of all the largest rivers south of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi The two ranges thus hold one of the chief sources of the wealth of 13 states -their water power. The bill to establish the Appalachian and White mountain reserves, when first propose was opposed by those who declared that each individual state should attend to the matter for itself, following New York state's example in the Adirondacks. But the states concerned in the proposed reserves are pecuniarily unable to do so. Again, the creation and maintenance of a reerve often concerns other states than that or those in which the proposed reserve would be. Finally federal control is more efficient than state control. Hence, the bill to es-tablish Appalachian and White mount-ain reserves ultimately passed the Sen-ate without dissent, and was unanimously reported to the House of Representatives by its committee on ag-
